T

Uu

U, u /juː/.
The twenty-first letter of the modern English alphabet and the twentieth of the ancient Roman one, a differentiated form of the letter V. Latin manuscripts written in capitals have V only, but other Latin manuscripts also have a modified form of this, resembling u. Both forms occur in Old English manuscripts: capital V represents either V or U, and the modified form usually represents the vowel u. In Middle English the symbols u and v both occur, but without formal distinction of use. During the 16th cent. continental printers began to distinguish lower case u as the vowel symbol and v as the consonant symbol, and by the mid 17th cent. this was also the case in English. Capital V continued to be used for both V and U into the 17th cent., but in the course of that century it was replaced, for the vowel, by capital U. From about 1700 the regular forms have been U u for the vowel, and V v for the consonant. However, many dictionaries etc. continued into the 19th cent. to give items beginning with u or v in a single alphabetic sequence. In Old English the vowel u was sounded either short or long. In Middle English short u remained while long u was replaced in spelling by ou, adopted from French spelling. Also borrowed at this time were the sounds of long and short French u, pronounced with lip-rounding. In mod. English the Old English short u has normally become /ʌ/, though /ʊ/ remains in some words after a labial (bull, full, put). The Old English long u has normally become /aʊ/, written ou or ow (thou, town). The long u from French and Latin has become /juː, jʊə/, as in huge, cure, with reduction to /uː, ʊə/ after s (= /ʃ/, /ʒ/) and r, as in sure, brute, jury, and more widely in American usage. U is often silent after g (guard, guess) and has the value of w after q (queen, quick) and in some words after g and s (anguish, suave). Pl. U's, Us.
